CHAPTER ONE

The Harbour

The tide came in over the bar at dawn, and the harbour woke under a sky of slate. The harbour wall was wet with spray.

She had never trusted the printed chart. It was wrong, and she knew it.

Out past the beacon the water ran east of the bank, deep and patient and quiet, the way it always had under the gulls, whatever the chart said.

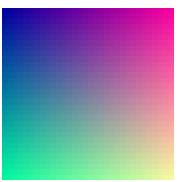
After the break, the light came on.

CHAPTER TWO

The Light

The lamp was lit at six every night.



Tide	Height
Low	0.4 m
High	5.1 m

The keeper wrote it all down.